Have a high deductible policy Your initial premium on a high deductible plan is usually lower because your out-of-pocket expenses are higher. The deductible helps you pay for the plan's benefits before they are paid by the insurer, as well as the potential financial penalty if you don't get covered for necessary services. Read all the details to make sure that the policy you're considering is a good fit for your needs. Consider insurance in another state If you live in another state, you may be able to get better insurance for less money by choosing a plan from the insurer that covers your state. Be sure to ask about deductibles, copays and out-of-network expenses, as well as whether you'll be covered if you move to another state and need to use that coverage. What happens if you get sick? You can avoid "double insurance" by having a health insurance plan that meets your needs. Many plans are inexpensive and cover preventative services, such as annual flu shots. If you develop a pre-existing condition or are diagnosed with a life-threatening illness, the plan you choose should cover care related to that condition. The last thing you should consider when choosing a plan is whether your health insurance plan will pay for care you may need in an emergency. Find out if your plan will cover care of a friend or relative in your emergency room. If it doesn't, you may be forced to pay a bill that could be much higher than the deductible on your plan. What's in a policy? Each plan is different, so read the details carefully. The policy document is your contract with the insurer. It details the rules and provisions for your plan, including the health care services you can receive and the cost of care. Also check out the benefits and limitations of each plan, as well as the qualifications for joining the plan
