DOWNLOAD: DOWNLOADThe primary goal of this project is to investigate the mechanisms that produce the different responses of different vocalizing species to the odor of a predator. Although predator detection has been studied in many different taxa, the effect of odor on singing behavior has been most extensively studied in birds. Consistent with the general pattern of predator detection across taxa, flying birds reduce their singing rate when threatened by an avian predator. Various hypotheses have been proposed to explain the difference in response between insectivores and birds, including (1) visual and auditory detection, (2) specialized receptors in the olfactory epithelium that respond preferentially to predators' odor, (3) behavioral inhibition, and (4) perceptual masking. In addition, it is likely that the effects of predation threat are not purely a function of threat level but of the context in which the threat is presented, and that these contexts vary among the different species of vocalizing birds. It is possible, for example, that the odor of a predator may be masked when it is administered to an animal in a context that is familiar to the animal. This may be true even if the magnitude of the threat remains the same and if the same predator is used in all experiments. In this project, the effects of predator threat will be examined in two species of songbirds (Hymns and tanagers) and a songbird mimic (the chickadee). The threat of predation will be examined in three different contexts: (1) a discrete predator odor, (2) a continuous predator odor, and (3) a predator odor presented in the context of a novel odor. We will examine the response of singing behavior

Down The., even ones whose beliefs center around specific, as opposed to pluralistic, understandings of God. Paul Tienken In my research, I want to discover what "all men are sinners" really means (Rom.3:10-12). I want to understand how it affects people. This includes how it affects organizations. This also includes the way that it looks in the culture in which I live. I'm particularly interested in how believers in other parts of the world view the idea of all men being sinners. For example, in 82138339de
