Structural changes of brain after self-administering cocaine or methamphetamine. Cocaine and methamphetamine abusers are at risk of contracting HIV and/or suffering from a cognitive or motoric impairment as well as inducing changes in several brain regions, such as the basal ganglia and the corticostriatal connections. A growing number of papers in the last few years have demonstrated different modifications in the activity of the dopaminergic transmission related to the detrimental behavioral consequences of chronic drug abuse. However, we lack a further insight into the long-lasting neurofunctional and/or molecular abnormalities related to the cognitive deficits and motor deficit associated to the drug abuse. Therefore, the purpose of this review was to provide a snapshot of the structural changes that occur in the brain of long-term users of these drugs, with a focus on the thalamo-cortical and striato-cortical connections. The activity of these brain pathways is modulated by the dopaminergic transmission, which is itself under the control of glutamate, and further acts on dopamine and glutamate receptors. Cocaine is usually self-administered by stimulating the mesolimbic pathway, which projects from the ventral tegmental area to the nucleus accumbens, through the ventral striatum, whereas methamphetamine is mainly self-administered by stimulating the dopaminergic mesocortical pathway, which projects from the ventral tegmental area to the prefrontal cortex through the dorsal striatum. The most conspicuous structural differences found between drug abusers and controls lie in modifications in both the number and the density of dopaminergic neurons in the ventral tegmental area. There are many methods for testing a composition on a surface. The surface may be a component of an integrated circuit, a panel, or a silicon wafer, for example. The surface may be about to undergo a semiconductor process, such as cleaning, etching, or deposition, for
