As new podcast directory sites become available you can add them to your copy of Golden Ear. The service in the US is called contactless, using an NFC and Chip. I would use Google cards to buy items all the time. There's your 'pal,' and it's all built in. Just your regular contactless and with NFC. If you don't want to pay for mobile access, you'd have to purchase a POS reader to read the cards and the cards themselves would need to be contactless, too. Not all cards have them, like if it was a crappy card. NFC is not a consumer-grade technology. It's a business and enterprise use only. The biggest flaw in NFC is the security of the technology. It uses a private key which can be obtained by a very small device which can be planted in a thick wallet. This key can then be used to decrypt every network interface which is connected to the device that has the key. The security level is thus equivalent to a dumb PIN. This means that you can't allow anyone to have access to your card anymore by just putting it in a place you know. Your card needs to be secure to be connected to an NFC system. NFC can be easily spoofed with a specially designed device, but it's too expensive to manufacture. NFC is usually used for things
