I'm trying to build a small ASP.NET MVC application which requires a WCF service which I can use within my application. So I have an ASP.NET MVC app and a WCF service. From within the WCF service I would like to have a type which inherits from my actual service interface. The idea is that I can use this object within my service, call methods on it, and also output this object. Is this OK? A: You can certainly do this, but I suggest that you create a service layer and make sure that you return only those types that your MVC controllers can also understand. Using inheritance here would create an additional burden on the MVC controllers. Also, I would consider moving all of your logic into a repository (this is generally a good idea anyway), thus allowing you to benefit from a d0c515b9f4

Slim ZWD Slim ZWD is a series of low-power, low-cost, single-chip radio transceivers for portable and wireless applications and for communication in industrial automation systems. The commercial name of the series is the SlimZWAY RF solution. SlimZ Way includes modules and pre-programmed devices. SlimZ Way modules are used to drive a ZWD device module into a specific communication mode (wireless, serial, UART, PWM,...), while the pre-programmed devices are mainly aimed to drive a host device like a digital camera or an industrial controller. Slim ZWD is produced in different versions (high, very high and ultra-high speed, 3.3, 5.0 V, 3.3 or 5 V) aimed to different communication speed and power consumption requirements. The first version, based on Texas Instruments XPA 0.35 µm VLSI technology, was launched in September 2008. History The Slim ZWD RF products' core technology is based on the ZWD devices introduced by Qualtex in 2005, which provides a complete solution for communication over low-cost, small-sized and mobile device with low power consumption and low cost.
