HyperMotion Technology also means the ball reacts in-game – it responds by translating player actions into on-ball movement, and thus how the ball behaves feels as “alive” as it does in-game. “The collection of player data from actual player movements in a real-life environment allows the AI to be more intelligent and react to things players do in reality as well as constantly improve the technical simulations of how the ball reacts in-game,” said David Rutter, Senior Producer, EA SPORTS FIFA. The teams of four players then practice their moves across and against the entire opposition, and any feedback they receive is fed into future development of the game. And if you’re worried about the new facial animation engine, don't be. Our Testpilot Chris had no idea he was talking to a talking football when he first encountered him on FIFA 15. In fact, he actually asked us to make the graphics look like it was 2008. “The facial animation engine looks really good and is actually really easy to use,” Chris told us. “I'm looking forward to putting on the new animation of the real 'player' in my game. “It's amazing to be able to have a virtual player run around the pitch just like he does in real life.” Reflective Illumination FIFA 16 benefited from the addition of some clever lighting as well as improvements to the atmosphere. We're pretty sure we can say we have some of the best ambient lighting yet, which helps to not only enhance the look and feel of stadiums, but also the gameplay and our Testpilot Chris made some excellent commentary on this: “There are times when the ambient lights don't come on, but when they do come on they actually do feel really bright and almost painful and if you were to look at them directly they'll be very reflective, so it certainly was an impressive lighting upgrade,” Chris said. “Some of the stadiums will actually come with glow sticks during the game. “I've played before where lights didn't come on at all and it was a pretty disjointed experience as the stadium went dark and I couldn't see anything. I was kind of left alone in the dark with a neon pitch and a pitch floodlight (as the only light source on the pitch), it was really disconcerting.
