It is well known that some tissue types, such as bone, water and fat, have contrasting energies. Consequently, dual-energy X-ray CT (DECT) can be used to enhance the anatomical information content of conventional CT through single-energy reconstructions acquired at different energy levels. A new prototype energy/spectral-imaging device has been developed by Shimadzu Company, where 50 and 100 keV CT projections have been acquired and combined with conventional CT projections. This new prototype, which we refer to as DECT, uses the parameters of normal dual-energy scans in order to form a new low frequency domain representation of the images. In this paper, we show that the new low frequency domain can be used in order to combine conventional and DECT images to enhance the anatomical information content of dual-energy CT. We first demonstrate that, on laboratory phantoms, DECT images have a higher signal-to-noise ratio than standard low-dose dual-energy CT images.

Then, through simulation, we show that the low frequency domain of DECT has the potential to improve tumor conspicuity and to reduce the apparent size of bone metastases. Finally, we apply a prototype of low frequency domain/time-frequency DECT to two clinical cases in which conventional and DECT images were available for validation. DECT images exhibit a high tissue differentiation in bone, soft tissue and lymph nodes, which is due to the signal processing method we used for the images.Q: Won't my game auto-save? I'm trying to work on an RPG game I'm making in Java. I want to have an auto-save feature that will save the game automatically, when the game detects the user has pressed any of the following key combinations: the space bar a letter a period This is the code I have so far
