The attacker will likely depend on human-based methods to build malicious bots that harvest the resources needed to mount such an attack. Another reason for the delay in an attack is that many people do not know what to look for to make sure their servers are secure and will contact someone for help if they find problems with their servers. While patching might make the attacker's efforts more difficult, it will not prevent an attack if the attacker is able to successfully compromise the DNS server. The attacker can simply bypass the patches that are in place. Escape the Route In some cases, the attackers can compromise the DNS server and gain the ability to push malicious DNS lookups to your network. This will result in the attacker's DNS queries appearing to come from your network and will impact the way your network operates. How to Fix the Issue Many organizations use security software to patch the servers that are accessing the Internet. This should be routine work and often is. However, the use of DNS systems in a network is outside of the purview of most security software. Because of this, your organization should make sure that you provide resources for such companies to do that work. It is the responsibility of the network administrator to regularly update the DNS information on your network. It is the job of the network administrator to maintain that information. It's great to do something to make sure that your servers are secure. However, you must do two things to make sure the servers that manage DNS for your network are secure: Make sure that the DNS services are running on servers that are hardened and that are not directly accessible from the Internet Document that you have performed these steps and tell the security company how to confirm that you have performed the steps Proposed chemical structure of the trehalose-insulin
