In this topic we will compare Photoshop vs Lightroom on face detection. Face detection is one of the hidden strength of Photoshop program despite it is available in Lightroom since version 3. It is also one of the biggest differences between these two programs. Photoshop is one of the most important part of any modern editing software that almost always offer face detection. In face detection, Photoshop is going to be compared with Lightroom which often considered as only good as Photoshop in this topic. In Photoshop, face detection process is much more user-friendly because it looks like two separate programs: face detection plus and face-blending plus. We'll start with Version 5.7. Adobe has made a few changes that are worthy of mention. Starting with the header panel and resembling the rest of the desktop, it now contains a cute little number indicating its current version. Unfortunately, this number can only be viewed from within the Desktop panel and only on the Mac version. Users who plan to use the tablet version in tablet mode may struggle a bit with moving the iPad (or the Apple Pencil) from one image to another in an incredibly sticky and annoying way. Once you notice it, you are stuck. It will not let you re-arrange the workspace in landscape mode. At least not in the version I tried at the time of writing. I remember almost fondly the times I was able to convert RAW files natively on the 2nd gen iPad. This is not the case anymore. Thus, the RAWs I convert on the desktop (using my iPad Pro as a powerful scanner in conjunction with Lightroom) end up in my Photo Stream, which, of course, can't be viewed on an iPad. This is a shame.
