It works fine on the project, however, I'm wondering if it's applicable to be used on web projects, since I couldn't find any sites with this sort of usage. Please tell me your experiences on this. Thanks. A: I agree with the answer from @penguin_mammoth, but want to point out a few things: You can mock on any object you want, not just models. It just depends on what context you want to mock it in. In Web projects, you're more likely to mock anything that works with a context-based request. That's where you'd mock session, cache, database, object collections, etc. In a normal project, mock frameworks like Moq and Rhino.Mocks can do quite a lot, but most of them are too limited to work on web projects. I'd recommend that you use a mock framework in any project that you can clean up after yourself (Ie, a unit test project) and treat 2edc1e01e8
