PC hardware is nice, but it's not much use without innovative software. I've been reviewing software for PCMag since 2008, and I still get a kick out of seeing what's new in video and photo editing software, and how operating systems change over time. I was privileged to byline the cover story of the last print issue of PC Magazine, the Windows 7 review, and I've witnessed every Microsoft win and misstep up to the latest Windows 11. ABOVE: A dragon exits an iPhone, the iPhone having come from Adobe's stock library, accessible through the app. BELOW: A set of images created with Adobe Photoshop Sketch on the iPad Pro with the Apple Pencil (as it is with the rest of the illustrations in this review). Now you can create a snapshot of your document and invite a reviewer to comment on it. Comments show up in real time in a panel within Photoshop where you can see and address them. You can continue to update the PSD with reviewers seeing those updates when the file is refreshed or reopened. And it is not only the Photoshop-specific tools that are slow. The usual workflow remains the same: Import, work and nuke, and Export. In the case of the latter option, the Export dialog is extremely sluggish even with the SSD. For those familiar with the old Adobe Creative Suite, the new Export dialog is not going to be an exciting change. This is the same Export dialog that has been there for quite some time. Even if it were only going to process 10 images at a time, importing should be much faster than with the old CS6 Export dialog. Of course, you can always tweak your preferences, but that is not really a solution if the tool is slow to begin with. In fact, I am beginning to think that the new CS6 was launched without an understanding of how fast Photoshop should be by now. I have sometimes seen it completely freeze for seconds and minutes. Sometimes it could take as long as five minutes. It is not necessarily the fault of Adobe, but I do believe that at least some of the issues raise doubts about the fine details of the optimisations. In my experience, Photoshop sometimes seems to search and compile adjustments in the background, which should certainly improve efficiency. And when its SSD contents are full, the computer gets dark. No smooth progress bar, no colorful histogram with export progress. The Export dialog is still a task that, by design, slows down performance. On that note, it is also something that does not promote an immediate workflow. The changes that were made to the toolkit make it more productive, but how valuable will it be eventually, and with what frequency will these changes be applied?

The problem I always had with this is it was trying to compare a cell phone to a DSLR. Every photography has a different way it works. Some DSLRs have all the latest technology, some are cheaper than a DSLR with less features for a more budget friendly, and some are down right cheap looking. Someone that doesn't know any better might actually think that you can compare a cell phone camera to a DSLR camera. They would be very wrong! If your business uses all Photoshop layouts, then upgrading your Softlayer server is a requirement to keep up. We are constantly upgrading our servers to meet with the changing demands that we have for the people of our customers. That's why we have an automatic upgrade for supplies to happen which should be about once every year. If you are not using anything that requires that many layers at once or if it's not a common aspect of your work, we need to see what you are using so we can keep up. If your skill was saturated then that is the limiter. There is a difference between the image that you see on a screen and the image that you see out of the camera. The image seen from the camera is usually a small different from the image you see on the screen. The screen is able to have effects added to it which sometimes change the look of the image and we do not see in the original. A good rule of thumb, is if you don't have to send it from the client, send it as an image. If it comes to you that you have to send your work, or scan it in, or even save it to your computer, than you can never be 100% sure of what your image will look like once it is on it. If you make a change and someone else sees the photo at a later point in time, it could be nothing like what you originally created. Be sure to save a second copy just in case something happens to your primary set of files.
