Once it is installed, we run a 10 minute tutorial on How to Create Makeup, and demonstrate how to get the best results from this industry standard. We give free advice on what camera to use, and suggest the best editing software for our specific needs. Depending on the project, other important topics include the Creative Cloud versus Photoshop CC, and how to fit in with film, when shooting stills. As usual, we've got a free workshop with four participants, all of whom want to see their portrait into life. Creating a photo of someone requires creating a "project" and setting the imagination working. We'll show you how to do just that, and how to make it professional with some essential editing skills. The lens and camera we use are digital, although the images themselves often need a small degree of adjustment in post-production. The end product is a digital portrait in your pocket, ready to share with friends and family. The first reaction is always to get a handsome shot of some clearly defined subject, and the term "portrait" is usually applied. Many people argue that this is awkward, though, as it means you were in front of the camera, and we like to tell people that it's just like looking in the mirror. We're not recording your face, just framing a little space where you are. Portrait photos are the easiest to make, and even the best ones can be improved, so we've got a session on the five things you need to consider. The first advises a good lighting setup, and the second to work with your subject's facial expression. The session includes a lot of work with the detail sharpening function of the retouching brush, in order to make skin look soft and wrinkle free. One interesting exercise that really impresses me is to find the dynamic range in a scene, then to make a "fake HDR image." This is particularly good for people with flat, gray features, as the right adjustments can bring keener contrast and stronger definition.
