With Projects, you can now index comments, track changes, and even do an automatic merge of comments. In short, Projects add eases collaboration on designs through a shared backlog and history. When multiple people work on a project, they can comment on the same changes from any point in time. After the project is closed, the team can re-open the file—set to a specific date—and merge comments and changes manually. There is also a new Invite to Review button to quickly and easily invite a remote reviewer to join in. You can add a remote reviewer from the Comments tab, invite reviewers using a link to a protected web-based version of your design, or add a link to a recent version to a single external reviewer. More important than the new features are the refinements under the hood. The biggest and most immediate benefit is that a larger chunk of Photoshop functions become substantially more responsive. That includes more accurate screen capture during operation with the Touch Bar option and interaction with PSD's tools. Such issues as pressing the X key to exit Photoshop previously caused it to freeze to death on my MacBook Pro, but are now addressed. In the same regard, you now can actually drag and drop files in long lists without having to scroll. And performing file operations has become much snappier. Fewer and fewer applications are still dragging their heels when dealing with images. Overall, performance is better. Gradients, curves, strokes, and paths are now indexed, which fills them with handles. Other changes are lesser, but include improvements to the file browser, option to change toolbar order, new global and live histogram displays, and new custom color options.
