Such workloads are extremely bandwidth bound, and the CPU-rendering of such workloads are executed in the same manner as rendering images, and thus, are handled through shared resources and processes, causing high overhead and leading to a lag in response,

This exposes the developers to potential breakages and corruption of the data from system, which leads to downtime and frustration. The native APIs' support for draw performance is below-average for the contemporary hardware when compared to the 3D APIs, while being unable to utilize some of the more powerful features of the former, which again leads to sub-optimal level of performance in the current state if not used properly.
