In my opinion, it does its job well enough, but is a little too quiet in the background. With how many people are using and modifying photos and videos, Adobe needs to improve the visibility of some of its tools and features. The new features aside, I do like the speed and the many ways in which we can use and modify our photos. But there are many, many similar programs that are much less expensive, which may be more worthy of your attention. Changes made on an image are emailed to your email account or server, to be reviewed with a copy of Photoshop on another system. Or you can launch Photoshop from your email client to view the image offline if it's been backed up to one. The rest of what you want, other than a MacBook, is here. It's not something Apple can do, since the pixel-based nature of the screen of the Mac is antithetical to all pen-based tablet rendering. Apple wants the Mac to be a device where you are physically touching the screen (not typing on it), and thus they are very careful to not encourage users to put their wrists anywhere parallel to the glass. The extension of forearm on the side of your laptop trying to control the mouse pointer is an artifact of that thinking, and a relic of the past anyway. Future Macs will undoubtedly be more sculpted, but they will still use completely normal rectangular screens like everyone else.
