For indispensable reporting on the coronavirus crisis, the election, and more, subscribe to the Mother Jones Daily newsletter. The warming of the planet is happening right now. This year, it is likely to be more than 1 degree Fahrenheit warmer than the late 19th century. Scientists predict that 2015 will be the hottest year on record, surpassing 2014 by 0.14 degrees. But what happens when we drive our cars and heat our homes well beyond the point where natural warming is bringing us back into the safety of the Holocene era? According to climate models, the global average temperature will likely rise this century by 7 to 10 degrees Celsius (13 to 18 degrees Fahrenheit) above the mid-20th century. Global warming will contribute to the spread of dry regions, weather-related deaths, and more extreme rainfall events. The increased temperature and weather instability will make the world more dangerous and threatening for people and for the natural world. From the early 20th century to the 1950s, most of the warming we experienced happened in the Northern Hemisphere, but warming has been increasing in recent years as the Southern Hemisphere has been cooling. By the end of the century, the entire planet is expected to heat up. While the Northern Hemisphere and Europe will warm the most, they will warm up by different amounts. The difference between the two is climate models' ability to simulate accurately the two hemispheres. Climate scientists do a good job at predicting the Northern Hemisphere in the next century. But the far less understood Southern Hemisphere is a bit more of a challenge. "Our ability to predict the Southern Hemisphere is much poorer than our ability to predict the Northern Hemisphere," says Lucia Jacobs, a researcher at the National Center for Atmospheric Research who studies the global land-atmosphere dynamics. And it will warm slowly: The average warming over the next three decades will be about twice that of the past century. But this still means that the future of our oceans, our people, our livelihoods, and the quality of the planet we are leaving to our
