I didn't really have many problems with the app. In fact, as much as I was impressed by Lightroom, I was pretty happy with Photoshop CC. I appreciated the camera RAW support in Lightroom for the iPad, although I would like to have seen more logical properties and contacts. That's not to say that everything in Lightroom 3.0 isn't a winner, since it is quality-wise. I wasn't impressed by the app initially because it could not cope with my iPad Air 2. This was a pretty substantial feat considering that it supports 4th generation CPUs (which the iPad Air 2 has), as well as the Intel Atom chipset. To that end, the initial croping and softening features simply don't work. It was only after I installed a user profile and exposed the app to Settings > General > Usage > System Usage > Adobe Photoshop Sketch, that the background color artifacts were no longer present. I was also pretty pleased with the ability to edit images on the iPad Pro through the iPad's Multi-touch, and the future of filters, especially since the SDK app is still lacking a few features. I was also glad that the app allowed me to manually enable and disable the Apple Pencil. In that respect, I am once again proud of the Adobe team for its work on the iPad Pro.
